EXCERPT FROM EXPERT REPORT OF GARY ORFIELD, EXHIBIT B

The Gallup Poll Surveys

To clear up the uncertainty inherent in low-response surveys, we decided to focus on a limited number of law schools and hire a professional survey research firm of the highest quality to obtain the kind of response rate necessary to determine validly the views of the total student body of some law schools. We contracted with the Gallup Poll to obtain a high response rate to the questionnaire at Harvard Law School and the University of Michigan Law School.[17] Gallup was able, through extensive follow-ups, to reach 79% of the students at these two highly selective law schools,[18] a rate that was subsequently raised to 81% by follow-up calls from our research team. A total of 1,820 students were surveyed at these two renowned law schools. As a result, we have the best available survey data exploring the central propositions set out by the Supreme court in the Bakke decision.

Both of these universities draw very large numbers of applicants and place their graduates in excellent positions but they are different in several respects. Harvard is private, eastern, and faces no legal challenge to its admissions policies, Michigan is public, mid-western, and is facing a law suit challenging its admissions practices. In light of these and other differences, one might expect quite different patterns of response, but we found striking similarities on many dimensions. The fact that many of the results parallel those found in the small samples in the seven campus internet study also suggests that these findings reflect broadly held opinions.

Table 2

Frequency of Contact with People of Different Race or Ethnicity while Growing Up (in %)

	None				Often
	1	2	3	4	5
Harvard Students	10.8	28.7	20.7	15.7	23.7
Michigan Students	12.3	32.4	20.4	15.6	19.3

Among students at these two elite law schools about a fourth of Harvard students and a fifth of Michigan students had frequent contact with students of other racial and ethnic backgrounds when growing up and two in five had little or no contact. The statistics for high school experience were very similar.

Table 3

Contact with People of Different Race or Ethnicity in Your High School (in %)

	None				Often
	1	2	3	4	5
Harvard Students	10.8	26.5	19.7	18.9	23.8
Michigan Students	10.4	31.3	22.5	17.7	18.1

Among the U.S. law students in the survey, whites were the least likely to report frequent interracial contact while growing up or in high school, while blacks were most likely to have had such experiences. Thirteen percent of whites reported no interracial contact while growing up and another 37% reported very little. The corresponding numbers for African Americans were 4% and 2%. For Hispanics they were 0% and 2%. Sixty-three percent of African American students reported they had often had such contact, compared to only 12% of whites. The statistics for high school were very similar. In other words, almost no blacks and Latinos who succeeded in enrolling in these elite law schools came from a highly segregated childhood and education, but almost half of the whites did. A national study of school segregation patterns in 1996-97 showed that whites were by far the most segregated ethnic group in American schools and that they were remaining highly isolated even as the nation's school enrollment reached 36% nonwhite.[19] To the extent that interracial experience and understanding is an important educational goal, clearly whites were the group most in need of this experience in law school. Later questions will show that such experiences did, indeed, have powerful impacts.
